Introduction and Class Objective

Largely due to the technological revolution, crime has become a global phenomenon. Drug and human traffickers, identity thieves, computer hackers and modern day pirates are have successfully demonstrated that criminals are globalizing themselves along with the more legitimate business sectors of the world. In addition, other dangerous organizations have entered the global community in order to spread or defend a political or religious doctrine. While not always motivated by the acquisition of wealth, these groups nonetheless use international criminal organizations to promote their ideologies by obtaining weapons, forge documents and kill their opponents. Irrespective of their motivations, terrorist groups and other international criminal enterprises have both relied on the mechanisms of modern international markets to reach their consumers. The purpose of this class is to give students an introduction to this new and complex area of modern crime from a criminology and criminal justice perspective. Throughout this quarter, we will be not only cover practical matters involved in international crime and International law enforcement but, more importantly, critically analyze some of the more abstract, theoretical issues. For example: Would legalizing prostitution make it a safer and less exploitative industry? Is terrorism a problem that should be treated as a criminal problem or is our fight against terrorism an all-out war? These and other questions will be debated and discussed throughout the course of this class. In the end, the student should walk away from this course having gained a basic understanding of the global phenomenon of crime, international law enforcement polices and a sharper ability to think critically in the field of global criminology.
